MOM, As your only Son and your the last one you gave birth to, you will be forever in my heart and missed more everyday. But because of the strong woman that you were and continue to be in spirit, I'm certain that it will make me a better person moving forward. I will carry your unconditional love with me everyday and always think of you. I love you mom.

Justin Eric Liebman posted:

My grandmother was probably the only person in my life on my father's side of the family that took any interest in my talents and gifts. She would ask me to play music for her when she was staying at my house and nobody but us were around. Although she had trouble remembering things one thing that she did remember was that she played an important role in each of our lives. I remember having conversations with her about my mother and father and she shed quite a bit of light on who I was and who I was destined to be. As her first-born male grandson she told me things that I will never forget and will pass down to my own children. She taught me that kindness is not just an act of being kind, but it is the content of the heart. She also taught me how to laugh at things when they weren't in the slightest comical, in which I'm still struggling to understand to this day. Knowing that she is no longer around causes me to feel like a part of myself has left this world with her, but I am not sad in the slightest. Instead, I am joyful because she no longer must be hungry, no longer must feel pain, no longer must put up with the troubles of this world and the people who force themselves into our existence, no longer has to wait for the day to be reunited with her deceased parents, grandparents, siblings, aunts, uncles, cousins, and friends. So for this I shed a single tear, but this tear consists of feelings of joy and excitement to know that she is at peace. Most people will have mixed feelings about death, but I feel that the end is only just the beginning. For this reason I am lucky to have had such a strong and governing influence upon my life when everything else in my environment was utter chaos and disbandment. Roberta Liebman I shall see you again and we will forever be united in each other's hearts. From one member of the tribe to another, Shalom.

My dear Nana Bobbie. This website and all the apologies from family and friends I guess means this is real, and as much as I'd like to turn back time for one more day or time to talk to you. This happened and my last "I love you" was really my last. When I got the call at 3am it just didn't register that my nana bobbie I used to listen to "who let the dogs out" with is no longer with me. You had such a tough long journey and in my eyes you won the battle. You can feast on and make all the food and spaghetti surprise you want with no worries on not being able to hold it down. Enjoy the powers of your healthy and perfect body in heaven
